Rationale

Public concerns regarding sex offenders have led to extensive changes in policy and legislation affecting this population. Clinicians and researchers alike have been challenged with the task of assessing and treating individuals who have committed sexual offenses. However, much remains unknown regarding the causal factors underlying sex offending behavior.

This workshop is designed to increase our understanding of why individuals engage in sexually deviant behavior and help us better assess and treat their clinical needs.

Objectives

Upon completion of this program, participants will be able to:

- Identify several limitations of historical causal theories of sexual offending.
- Describe the role of self-regulation and self-regulatory deficits in the development of sex offending behaviors.
- Apply these concepts to several hypothetical examples and discuss how these would be implemented in treatment.

About the Presenter

Jill D. Stinson, PhD, is a licensed psychologist & the Sex Offender Treatment Coordinator at Fulton State Hospital in Fulton, Missouri. She is a member of the Association for the Treatment of Sexual Abusers, the American-Psychology Law Society, American Psychological Association, and Association for Psychological Science.

Dr. Stinson provides sex offender treatment, clinical supervision, and extensive training related to sexual violence, including work with sex offenders with serious and persistent mental illness and intellectual and developmental disabilities. Her research focuses on the role of self-regulation in the development of sexual offending, manualized treatment, and the assessment of risk in diverse sex offender populations.

Her recent book, Sex Offending: Causal theories to inform research, prevention, and treatment (American Psychological Association, 2008) describes the etiology of problematic sexual behavior. Other publications addressing self-regulation and sexual offending and the assessment of sexual deviance have appeared in the International Journal of Law and Psychiatry, Journal of Psychiatric Practice, Violence and Victims, and the International Journal of Offender Therapy and Comparative Criminology.

Dr. Stinson received her doctorate in Clinical Psychology and Psychology, Law, and Policy from the University of Arizona. She has presented at numerous national and international conferences and provided consultation on working with difficult sexual offenders.
