

Ethics & Community Engagement in Mental Health Research

~ Wednesday, June 3, 2009 ~

Room 170, Busch Student Center, 20 N. Grand Blvd (Corner of Grand & Laclede), St. Louis, MO 63103

Rationale

Participants in mental health research frequently differ from participants in other types of medical research in significant ways including: stigma, institutionalization, cognitive deficits, and poverty. Thus, mental health research can present unique ethical problems. Many additional protections have been proposed for participants in mental health research. Yet it is important to ensure that the ethical design of research considers the values and priorities of research participant communities. The community engagement movement seeks to give participant communities a voice in the research enterprise. This serves not only to respect research participants, but may also increase the likelihood of meeting enrollment goals and obtaining rich and trustworthy data.

This symposium will consist of keynote talks by leading researchers in mental health ethics, responses by leading experts in cultural competence and mental health consumerism, and discussion with participants.

Objectives

Upon completion of this program, attendees will be able to:

- Describe and discuss the attitudes and preferences of participants in a variety of mental health studies
- Identify best practices for engaging communities on the ethical design of mental health research
- Develop strategies for applying best practices within various sectors of the mental health community.

Designed for

Institutional Review Board members, Physicians, Nurses, Psychologists, Social Workers and others who work in mental health research. Those who interface with mental health clients during the study period will find this to be vital information. It may help you to communicate more effectively with clients and increase participant compliance with research protocols.
