11:30 am Questions and evaluation

Borderline Personality Disorder (BPD) has long been considered one of the most difficult mental disorders to live with or to treat. Individuals with this diagnosis often come to treatment with multiple diagnoses and complex life problems. Providers quickly become discouraged when implementing traditional forms of outpatient treatment, and the most difficult clients often end up repeating cycles of outpatient and inpatient terms of treatment, punctuated by despairing periods of no treatment. New understandings about the origins and development of this disorder, as well as new approaches in treatment have provided hope for this treatment population, the providers who work with them, and the families and other individuals impacted by them. This workshop will highlight advances in research and treatment that contribute to high rates of remission in this disorder in modern treatment settings.

Upon completion of this program, participants will be able to:

- Distinguish between motivational theories that have evolved around this population and the criteria required for diagnosis
- Learn current research bases is for modern understandings of the etiology of BPD
- Identify three current empirically based models showing efficacy in treatment of the disorder.

Ronda Oswald Reitz, PhD, is the Coordinator for Dialectical Behavior Therapy (DBT) services for the Missouri Department of Mental Health. In this role, she is charged with the implementation, support, and evaluation of DBT programming in public mental health settings statewide. She has developed DBT programming in diverse settings including community mental health, inpatient, and juvenile detention facilities. Dr. Reitz is experienced in providing training and consultation to mental health providers at all training levels and in diverse settings across the United States.
